Dear Phil:

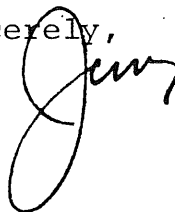

I think I detect a difference between the dreams you have written and the dreams Adam has written.

If I understand correctly, your dreams seem to be statements which have achieved wide acceptance, but which you, skeptically, suggest might only be dreams.

Adam's, on the other hand, are ideals of perfection, probably unattainable.

The former were probably collected by you over a period of years. The latter are easier to do on order. So, like Adam, I am doing the latter.

Sincerely,

Encl.

The dream of international law is international law: law whose writs and processes could run even against states, and end forever the recourse to the gruesome "ultimate arbitrament".
